

Crowns and Headdresses in Ancient Egypt

Crowns and Headdresses in Ancient Egypt

Task 1- read the information about the different crowns and headdresses

In ancient Egypt, crowns and headdresses were used:

- to show that someone was powerful;
- to make pictures of gods and rulers recognisable;
- for religious ceremonies.

Ancient Egyptian pharaohs wore different crowns for different occasions and to show their loyalty to certain gods. Let's take a look at some of the most famous ones.

Did You Know...?

No crown from a pharaoh has ever been found by archaeologists. It is likely that they were made from delicate materials such as fabric, leather or papyrus. Our best source of information is the paintings and carvings of gods and rulers that have survived.

(This information links with our last history lesson about sources of evidence)

Deshret: The Red Crown

- The Deshret was a high-backed crown which showed that the wearer was the ruler of Lower Egypt. It is thought that it was made from fabric or leather and had a copper or wire spiral.
- The red crown was the symbol of the goddess Neith, who was the patron of the city of Sais in Lower Egypt.
- Lower Egypt is the area around the Nile delta in the north of the country.

Hedjet: The White Crown

- The white crown is also known as the Hedjet. It is tall with a rounded end and was probably made out of cloth or felt.
- The white crown was worn by rulers of Upper Egypt (the south). It had a special association with the goddess Nekhbet, the white vulture goddess and protector of pharaohs.
- Horus, the falcon god, was usually shown wearing the white crown.

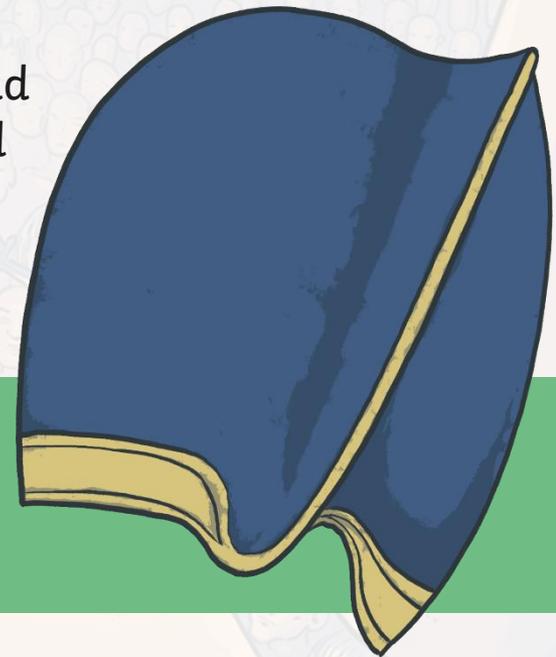

Pschent: The Double Crown

- The double crown is also known as the Pschent crown or 'sekhemti', which means 'two powerful ones'.
- Around 3100 BC, King Menes of Memphis brought together Lower and Upper Egypt and founded the First Egyptian Dynasty. A dynasty is a line of kings who all belonged to the same family. In total, 30 dynasties ruled over ancient Egypt.
- Sometimes, you may see two animals attached to the front of this crown: a cobra, representing the goddess Wadjet of Lower Egypt, and a vulture, representing the goddess Nekhbet of Upper Egypt. Together, they were known as 'The Two Ladies'.
- This crown is a combination of both the Deshret and Hedjet crowns, and kings wore the crown to show that they ruled over all Egypt.

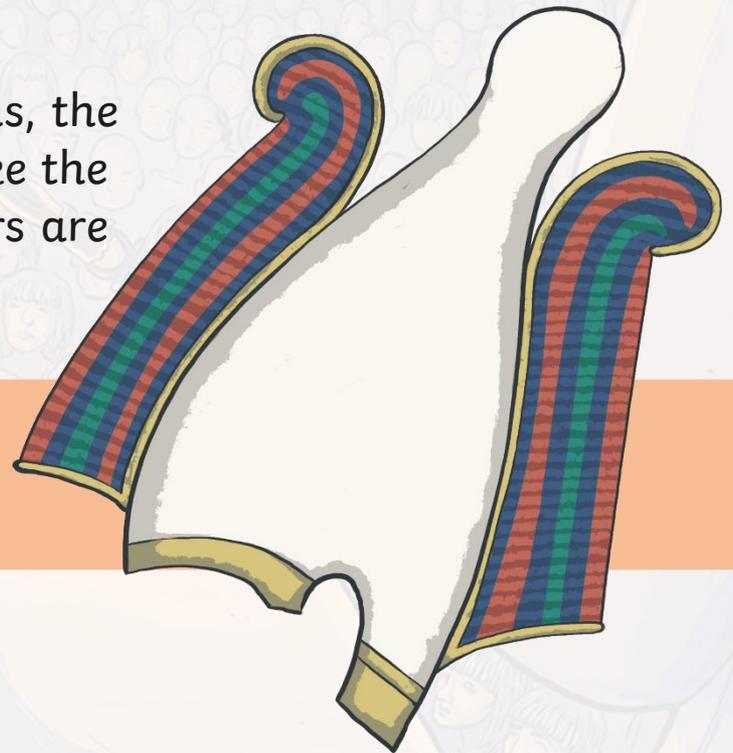

Keprsh: The Blue Crown

- The blue crown was also known as the 'war crown' or the Keprsh Crown.
 - It was probably made from cloth or leather and then stained blue. Sometimes, it was decorated with gold, sun-shaped discs and a uraeus.
- The Kheprsh was often worn by pharaohs when going into war. We know this because many battle and hunting scenes show them wearing one.

The Atef Crown

- The Atef was worn during religious rituals. It was a white crown made from woven plant stems and trimmed with ostrich feathers. The later versions had a gold disk at the top to represent the sun.
- The crown was most often worn by Osiris, the ruler of the Underworld. It looks a lot like the Hedjat crown but the two ostrich feathers are thought to represent truth and justice.

Nemes Headdress

- The Nemes is not actually a crown, but a cloth worn by Egyptian rulers. Perhaps the most famous nemes headdress is shown on the death mask of Tutankhamun, the boy king.
- The striped fabric covered the head of the pharaoh then draped down the back and over the shoulders. It was sometimes combined with the double crown and a uraeus.

Ornaments

- Sometimes, crowns had ornaments and symbols added to them. They may have been for protection or to symbolise a particular god.
- The symbols were usually animals or plants. Sometimes, real feathers and horns were added to associate the wearer with a god who took the form of an animal, such as Amun.
- Crowns of queens and princesses often used plant ornaments to symbolise beauty and youth.
- The goddess Wadjet, protector of kings, is symbolised by a cobra. A uraeus is a small, upright cobra which was often added to the pharaoh's crown to show his power and link to the gods.

Dress Like a Pharaoh

Which crown is your favourite? Can you create an image/drawing of yourself wearing an ancient Egyptian crown/hedress? Remember the drawing techniques we have been focusing on. You could make your crown if you wanted too!

The background of the slide is a cartoon illustration. It features a large, dense crowd of stylized human faces, mostly with simple, neutral expressions. In the center of the crowd, a figure stands out, wearing a dark, textured outfit and a tall, pointed hat. This central figure holds a long staff or scepter in their right hand and has their left arm extended. The scene is framed by large, stylized hands or fingers on the left and right sides, suggesting a focus or a selection process. The overall style is colorful and illustrative.

Send Ms P a picture :)